Gold, Silver, and Industrial Metal Miners Update

Despite Monday's significant drop in gold, the gold miners managed to recover from the initial gap lower on the opening trade. This resilience is a positive sign, as the gold industry group only ended the day with a slight -.24% loss. The continued accumulation, reaching levels that suggest a significant move is imminent, further reinforces this positive outlook.

Last week, I pointed out the strength in the gold miners as they broke out of a five-month consolidation. Yesterday's test serves as a strong indicator of the gold miner's potential to surge higher.

Silver miners also experienced early selling but finished with a minor -.15% loss. The silver stocks are on the verge of completing a double bottom base that began on July 14. I am maintaining my Dolly Varden Silver (DVS) position and am actively looking to add new gold miners once I receive confirmation.

Industrial metal miners showed impressive strength from the outset yesterday. My purchase of Critical Metals (CRML) on Thursday capitalized on the group's strength, propelling it to test its first Fibonacci target. I took the opportunity to sell 1/3 of my position when CRML hit 5.20, securing a 26.5% gain. The surge in accumulation following Monday's CRML move surpassed 100-day highs and is a clear indicator of the potential for substantially higher prices.
